Case Study

The insurance requirements of a hospice are complex and can enter specialist areas of policy cover, such as medical negligence. Due to the differing risks, no two policies will ever be the same. The level of cover is determined on a case by case basis, depending upon the activities and staff employed.

As an example, we became involved with a hospice which was soon to undergo a novation exercise, transferring NHS employed doctors into hospice employment. Following this change, their level of cover would no longer be adequate, and an additional medical malpractice policy was required. There was also a requirement for the medical professionals to expand their own personal indemnity, which would have been provided by the NHS previously.

We undertook a full review of the hospice's insurance portfolio, simplifying the arrangement while also arranging the required protection from a medical negligence perspective. We also assisted with the communications to the medical professionals involved.

While our priority is always arranging the most robust protection possible, we're also mindful that cost is important when working with charitable organisations. Despite the enhancements in cover we made for the hospice, we were also able to deliver a substantial saving on the price of cover.

Next steps

The activities and services provided by hospices are constantly evolving. As such, the insurance protection must be regularly adapted to meet the expanding exposure. We recommend a full review of the insurance portfolio periodically to ensure that policies are fit for purpose, and hospices aren't at risk of uninsured claims.
